WORLD INTERRELATIONSHIP

The question uppermost in many minds is how President Coolidge is taking the background position to which he was relegated by the presidential nominations. Since the conventions Coolidge news has become increasingly hard to find on the front page, although up to the very hour of Hoover's nomination no name was oftener mentioned than that of the man who could have had Hoover's chance for the asking.

From outward appearances the president is taking his new position gracefully. He even seems to enjoy it immensely. This bears out the popular theory that he is tired of his job and that this alone inspired his famous words of a year ago. For him the days until inauguration day seem to lag.

But the occupant of the summer white house returned to the lime-light momentarily the other day by delivering an address that newspaper editors considered of more public interest than the bulletins of campaign managers for that day.

In that address, before the Wisconsin American Legion, Mr. Coolidge revealed himself as no isolationist. The world read with interest these words:

"The World War, stupendous catastrophe though it was, wrought one great good. It gave us an opportunity to know the world and afforded us a place in the world we did not have before. It revealed to us to a large extent both our powers and our responsibilities. It demonstrated so clearly the interdependence of all people that we are not likely to hear again in responsible quarters that what other nations do is no concern to ours."

There could be no better evidence of this appreciation of "our powers and our responsibilities" than that greatest of diplomatic triumphs, the Kellogg treaty.

LOOKING BACKWARD

There was a fine wartime rhetorical glow to the statement of the radio announcer to the effect that the radio dramatization of President Wilson's war message would "suggest the furor of national excitement on that April day in 1917 when the policy of watchful waiting and armed neutrality of a peace-loving nation suddenly was galvanized into a concerted determination to end the nightmare of the World war," but it had no more basis on fact than most of the other explanations of why the United States entered the war immediately after re-electing President Wilson on his promises to keep us out of war.

Few Americans still believe that the United States entered it "to end the nightmare of the World war." Before Woodrow Wilson changed his mind it was generally recognized that Germany was crying for peace and that the Allies were spending their last resources. It is certain the war would have ended in peace without victory for either side but for the magical resuscitatory effect on the near-bankrupt Allies of America's generous offer of men and money to keep it going.

England and France, who in 1916 and 1917 were doing all within their power to draw America into the bloody encounter, are now blaming the United States for prolonging the war for the enrichment of its capitalists. There are Americans who have experienced a similar change of mind.

One by one they are leaving the sinking ship. Ex-Senator Owen, of Oklahoma, is now also an ex-Democrat. He will vote for Hoover.

GLORIOUS BETSY

Copyright 1928, Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc.
"GLORIOUS BETSY," starring Dolores Costello, is a Warner Bros. picturization of this novel. Based on the play by Rida Johnson Young.

SYNOPSIS

A miniature of Betsy Patterson is tossed into a card game at Sweet Springs Inn by Preston, who boasts she gave it to him. La Vert overhears the remark and challenges Preston, wounding him in the ensuing duel. With the miniature safe, La Vert wanders into the woods, where he meets the lovely original of the picture wading in a stream. La Vert says nothing of the duel and allows Betsy to chide him for the unmanliness of his teaching profession. While he, in turn, mocks the worthlessness of her cavaliers, they are startled by distant voices calling, "Betsy."

"I shall see you at ten o'clock then—your French lesson."
"Yes—yes, at ten!" She turned and hurried along the path as fast as her bare feet would allow, followed by the dog, barking and leaping about her skirts.

CHAPTER III

Before a massive mahogany sideboard, decorated with decanters and a gleaming array of bottles, stood a negro servant in livery. Into a tall, fat-bellied glass full of finely cracked ice at the bottom of which reposed some sugar, he carefully measured a generous portion of Bourbon rye from a cobwebbed bottle. He stirred the mixture meticulously, and brought the sugar seeping up through the ice. From a pile of fresh, green mint he selected several small sprigs, crushed them, and stirred them in the glass. At last a white coating of frost began to appear on the surface of the container. Once more the servant selected several long stalks of the mint and thrust them into the drink, so that they raised their green heads over the rim of the glass.

"Eph! Eph, where's my julep? Don't you realize it's seven o'clock?" The loud voice came from the adjoining room of the Patterson suite in the Sweet Springs Inn, where William Patterson stood gazing at himself in a mirror, adjusting his stock. A short, heavy set man with a florid face, bushy sideburns, and twinkling eyes that could blaze with anger and blazing they were now, for the stock was too tight, and had to be rearranged. And so he fussed, and fumed, and swore, this stocky man who, despite his great wealth and the possession of many merchant ships, and his social prominence in Baltimore, claimed fame chiefly because he was the father of "Glorious Betsy."

Mumbling an answer, the negro surveyed the work of his hands with approval, and then picked up the glass, set it on a tray, and started for the bedroom. But at that moment a knock came at the outer door and, tray in hand, Eph hurried to answer. He turned the heavy brass knob, threw open the door, and admitted Mistress Patterson's French tutor.

"Good morning, Eph," Monsieur La Vert greeted the negro. Then his eyes lighted on the julep. "Ah, thank you," he took the glass from the tray and began sipping the liquor.

"Morning, Sah," Eph returned, his eyes popping as they followed the movements of the tutor. "Excuse me, sah, but da's Marse Patterson's julep."
"Mr. Patterson's?" Monsieur La Vert nodded. "It was indeed good." He replaced the empty glass on the tray and smiled at the astonished negro.

"Eph! Eph! Where the devil's that boy!" The voice came from the adjoining room, and in another moment Major Patterson was standing in his bedroom doorway glaring at the negro. "Where's my julep?" he demanded, his face red, his untied stock dangling from his hand.

"Excuse me, Sah," the negro looked from the one man to the other, scarcely knowing what to say. "De de-Frenchman took it, sah," he finally explained apologetically.

GAMBLE PARTY LEADER TELLS OF EXPERIENCES

Says Hardships of Travel Are Compensated by Humorous Details

ODD NEWS ITEMS

The Ernest Gamble Concert Party, which has appeared before some of the largest audiences ever assembled in the United States, has had many novel and unique experiences, according to Ernest Gamble, the well-known basso, who resides at Langhorne.

"The hardships of travel are compensated by the humorous things one sees, hears and reads," states the singer, who is ever ready to relate a new anecdote for his most willing listeners. After arising at three o'clock one morning to catch a train at Havre, Montana, Mr. Gamble considered he was well compensated for his trouble when his eyes lighted upon the following literary nugget in the local paper "The Promoter":

"Hoey Springs Upon the Lap of Summer."

"It was the blending of sunset, spring, fair, buoyant and gladsome, with summer, serene and ripe and mellow, when Miss Lydia Penhober, of Hinsdale, was invited to marriage yesterday to J. K. Bramble at the latter's residence."

"Miss Penhober is a young woman of 22, fair as a June morning, bubbling with new joy, and exhibiting with the physical charms of a June."

"In imagination it is easy to conceive a mental picture of the end of this sketch, wrapped in adoration before her, his tongue loosed with the intoxication of golden, spinning, prose poems into hot pink and shell-like outline, until the barriers about her heart were swept away by the torrents of love, poured forth in that characteristic, Adoniam English of which Judge Bramble is the master."

"Is it any wonder that Spring thus melted away into the passionate arms of dreamy Summer, fanned as it was by the chthonic of Love?"

"The Judge is too well known to need any extended introduction to the people of Northern Montana. He can be classed as a horse to whom this railroad was not a maiden vice upon the matrimonial track; he has before slipped of its sweets and learned that occasionally a little wormwood must be qualified with it."

"However, to gay Lechvart ever bailed at taking the bride because of the knowledge that his feet might be burned with lightning. No true sport he had around the girls in the next drive."

"The Promoter takes this occasion to wish that they may find that solace in each other's company that will ever cause them to forget the petty annoyances that beset their path-way. The bride may drink copiously at the very fountain head of legal knowledge without the annoyance of the usual retractor fee and the groom may rest from the cares and stress of many tedious preliminaries before the cutlery waters of witely sprightly and capricious, taking a second helping of the kidney stew without fear of the cold, mercenary eyes of the boarding house keeper boring into his very vitals and frothing his digestive works."

During one season Miss Vera Page, the violinist of the party, was the recipient of a most unusual compliment. Having forgotten her felt-lined carriage boots, while at a town in Texas, a cowboy who had become fascinated with her artistic playing, offered to turn to her hotel for the footgear. However, he brought them one of a time, to Miss Page. She extended her thanks, remarking at the same time that she regretted giving him so much trouble. The reply was "Don't mind it, ma'am, I wish you were a centipede."

In Mr. Gamble's "Peanut Scraps Book," which contains dozens of quaint, queer and amusing pieces, many relative to the Gamble party's programs, there is to be found the following from a small town paper:

"The Ernest Gamble Concert given by the Knights of Columbian, Thursday evening was a classic affair throughout. A better looking tribe would be hard to find. The two men of the company are stalwarts in physique and Miss Page the very personification of like grace and blonde beauty. With the violin she was charming and when she played 'Amie Laverie' with muted strings and double stops, with Stewart's spirited accompaniment, it was enough to lift one

"Mr. Edwin Shonert, the pianist, hasn't enough hair to stuff a sofa pillow, but his execution of classic music was exceptionally fine and without keeping count should judge he struck the keys a million times in five minutes. He has the touch of iron in the glove of velvet."

"Ernest Gamble, tall as a cedar of Lebanon, shins so well one does not mind his white gloves and party clothes. His voice is of great strength and richness. It is big enough for any hall with a surplus for an over-flow attendance."

ELECTION OF HOOVER MEANS REORGANIZATION

Will Without Doubt Be Along
Lines That Have Proved

HAS STUDIED PROBLEMS

WASHINGTON, Aug. 24.—Herbert Hoover's election as president of the United States will result in a determined effort to carry out a governmental reorganization program along the lines of the plan that has proved so effective in the commerce and interior departments.

This was indicated not only in Mr. Hoover's acceptance speech, but in an official pamphlet of the Republican National Committee made public today. It is entitled "Hoover's plan for Governmental Reorganization."

The introduction to the pamphlet states that one of the most fundamental and far-reaching speeches delivered by Mr. Hoover as secretary of commerce dealt with the reduction of waste in government by reorganization of executive departments, his views being made known before the annual meeting of the United States Chamber of Commerce in May, 1925.

"The Republican candidate for president has been a student of this vast problem and a consistent advocate of intelligent reorganization for long time," the booklet declares. "His views are the more significant at the moment because the Democratic candidate has announced that he will bring forward a plan for the 'complete over-hauling' of the federal government."

The fact is that all the federal reorganization which has been accomplished in recent years has been along lines developed by Mr. Hoover. In addition, he has a well-matured plan, the benefits of which he believes will be incalculable, both in direct savings to the taxpayers as well as in better service.

Briefly, it provides for centering semi-judicial or semi-legislative functions in boards or commissions; and placing administrative duties in the hands of individuals.

To give the chief executive full supervision at all times, Mr. Hoover would transfer all of the independent agencies of the government to the appropriate department.

Giving further point to that program, his work in reorganizing the commerce department so that it could carry on the great load it has handled in the past eight years and his consolidation of bureaus in the commerce and interior departments through the co-operation of Secretary Work and with the approval of President Coolidge, Mr. Hoover in his acceptance speech stated:

"Our Republican presidents have repeatedly recommended to congress that it would not only greatly reduce expenses of business in their contacts with government but that a great reduction could be made in governmental expenditure and more consistent and continued national policies could be developed if we could secure the grouping of these agencies devoted to the one major purpose under single responsibility and authority."

"I have had the good fortune to be able to carry out such reorganization in respect to the Department of Commerce. The results have amply justified its expansion to other departments and I should consider it an obligation to enlist the support of congress to effect it."

The first public expression by Mr. Hoover on the need for reorganization of government departments, according to Washington records, was the example of the bears, which he cited in a speech at the National Press Club shortly after he became Secretary of Commerce.

"I have found that the brown bears are under the jurisdiction of the secretary of agriculture, the grizzly bears under the care of the secretary of interior, and the polar bears under my protection as Secretary of Commerce," he told the club.

That illustration, displaying the Hoover faculty for directing interest to a problem by mentioning some unique and humorous phase of it, has

What's New?

NEWS changes with each passing hour. All kinds of news—fascinating, strange, prophetic, real and unreal. It comes flashing on the pages of your paper from all parts of the world, and you want to know what's new.

Advertising is a form of news. It is governed by the same general principles and answers your every question as to "what's new?" You can depend upon advertising news. It is truthful. If you want something for the home, you will find it advertised. If a dress, a suit of clothes, a hat, a pair of shoes, a diamond ring, a bridge lamp, an electric refrigerator or a house and lot—you'll find it advertised.

Advertisements supply the surest means of knowing "what's new" in merchandise. Learn to read them—trust them—profit by them.

Read Courier Advertisements as regularly as you do the news

Mr. Hoover has found hundreds of instances of overlapping of scattered functions, of "floating islands" in the dismal swamp of bad organization," as he neatly expresses it. Divided responsibility with absence of central authority costs the taxpayers of the United States hundreds of thousands of dollars every year, his study has disclosed.

Examining the dispersion of government functions at present, Mr. Hoover has learned that there are 14 bureaus in nine government departments or independent agencies supervising construction of public works; eight such bureaus in five departments directing conservation of national resources; fourteen in six departments handling direct aids to merchant marine and five in two departments looking after direct aids to industry; six in three departments concerned with direct aids to education, and thus through the whole list. The purchase of $250,000,000 worth of supplies annually is scattered through every branch of the government.

Large independent establishments like the Veterans' Bureau and the Shipping board as well as those of lesser size, should be directly responsible to a cabinet officer, in the opinion of the Republican candidate for president. They are now supposed to be under the direct supervision of the White House, although the maze of duties which the president must discharge prevents them from receiving adequate supervision and these responsibilities add to the unnecessary burdens of the president.

In his own department of commerce Mr. Hoover tried out his ideas with conspicuous success. After he assumed the office, representatives of commerce and industry were brought into conference to advise how the department might be organized to give the greatest measure of public service. With approval of Congress, divisions were set up for important commodity lines covering more than a score of commercial and industrial activities.

The two outstanding instances of grouping government functions more appropriately were the transfers of the Patent Office and the Bureau of Mines to the Department of Commerce from the Interior Department in 1925. President Coolidge, after listening to Mr. Hoover's ideas, agreed with him that both these bureaus had closer relationship with industry and commerce than with national resources. The technical and scientific services of the commerce department have coordinated their work with that of the bureau of mines, greatly increasing the value of its efforts.

Mr. Hoover does not fail to consider the relationship of Congress to the problem. He would suggest that the legislative branch of the government, after years of dealing with reorganization programs, now delegate the authority to proceed with it to the president or a special board, or a committee of its own members. Every other effort has failed, but none of them has had such a definite objective, such efficiency of purpose nor such a well-grounded basic plan as that suggested by the secretary of commerce.

He proposes, first, to group agencies having the same predominant major purpose under the same administrative supervision. Second, to separate the semi-judicial, semi-legislative and advisory functions from those of an administrative character, placing the former under joint advice and the latter, under single responsibility and third, to relieve the president of a vast amount of the direct administrative labor.

Having grouped the related agencies under the appropriate departments, Mr. Hoover would have special assistant secretaries put in charge of them, basing their selection on other than political grounds. Creation of new departments under additional cabinet officers is entirely unnecessary to carry his plan into effect according to Mr. Hoover.

Reduction of waste in federal administration by reorganization is considered by Mr. Hoover to be the third and final necessary step in the betterment of national government. The first two steps, basing of government employment upon merit and establishment of adequate control of expenditures through the budget system, have already succeeded.

"GLORIOUS BETSY," starring Dolores Costello, is a Warner Bros. picture of this novel. Based on the play by Rida Johnson Young.

SYNOPSIS
Sweet Springs Inn is the scene of an early morning duel over a miniature of Betsy Patterson. Her French tutor, La Vert, wins the duel and the miniature from Preston, who boasted that Betsy had given it to him. Strutting in the woods, La Vert meets Betsy, who has been waiting in the stream on a dare. She chides him for his unmanliness and lack of ambition. He says nothing of the duel, but, in turn, mocks the worthlessness of her cavaliers. When he returns to the Inn he is discharged by Betsy's father for insolence. At that moment Betsy returns barefoot from her arboreal adventure.

"Some man! Some men, Mademoiselle," Monsieur La Vert corrected petulantly. But he moved towards the front of the portico, his chin sunk on his stock; his right hand across his breast and half hidden within his vest.

"I said to the corner of Bachelard's Row," Betsy was laughing. "Another step further! Ogh! That's a rough bit! Sir Harry, give me my slippers." Betsy stretched out her hand to the black-haired Irishman with the laughing blue eyes, who had been tenderly guarding her slippers and hose. She took the slippers and hastily thrust her feet into them, and then ran up to the porch and soundly kissed Miss Massenbird on both cheeks.

"You look so blooming this morning, Auntie, dear," Betsy laughed. "What have you done to yourself?" "If I am blooming, it is a blush of shame for you," Miss Massenbird returned sharply.

"Oh, dear, you're not angry with me?" Betsy pouted most becomingly and brought a look of pleading to the eyes of her escorts. "You're always wanting Mary and me to rise early in the morning. We thought you'd be pleased."

"Then you must have a very erroneous conception of my moral character," Miss Massenbird returned.

"Oh, Auntie Ellen, your character's dear, but—do look!" Betsy pointed a finger in the direction of her tutor, whom she noticed for the first time. "Don't move, Monsieur! Stay just as you are. There, now, doesn't he look the image of Napoleon Bonaparte? Doesn't he?"

The others stared and then nodded assent. For Betsy was indeed right. The man had unconsciously fallen into a pose typical of the famous French general, and his position made the likeness doubly striking.

"Umph!" Miss Massenbird sniffed. "I wish there was some of the great man's blood in Mr. La Vert's veins that he might conquer your evil, scandalous ways. Mr. John Calhoun, she turned sharply to the tall young man who was gazing enraptured at the slightest movement of her niece. "If you knew how supremely ridiculous you look dangling those—those—articles about you would desist."

Calhoun looked down at the articles in his hand, and then hastily attempted to thrust them into his pocket. Betsy giggled irrepressibly.

"In my days, if a girl had gone barefooted, she would have been put in stocks," Miss Massenbird began.

"Stockings, you mean, don't you, Aunt Ellen?" Betty returned innocently.

"Stocks," I said: "wooden stocks."

"Oh, well, if that's all you're displeased about, don't scold me," Betsy coaxed, patting her aunt's hand. "It's all Sir Harry Blake's fault. He dared and boasted about his independent Irish girls, and you know, dear Aunt Ellen, I simply cannot take a dare. And they all encouraged me—every one of them!"

"Well, you know, Betty," Henry Clay began diffidently, and lowering his eyes, "I told you—you might take cold."

"You'll take cold yourself, Henry

Clay. You'd better wrap yourself up in that shawl you have bundled under your arm," Miss Massenbird announced with some asperity. "At your age, the early morning dews are dangerous."

Clay, looking somewhat chagrined, attempted to hide the shawl, but succeeded only in entangling the fringe with the buttons on his coat, and tried to move from out of the way of his accuser's eagle eyes.

"Oh, don't scold Mr. Clay," Betsy took up the cause of her admirer. "He's been so good to me Auntie. He added a pair of gold garter buckles to Sir Harry's stockings." Betsy ran on, not heeding Clay's attempts to forestall her story. "If I'd walk barefooted, didn't he, Mary?"

"Indeed he did, Auntie," Mary asserted vigorously, "and they all kept betting and egging her on." She took Betsy's hand and looked around at the men, disregarding their negative nodding that asked of her to say nothing more. "It's just as much their fault as Betty's."

"That does not matter," Miss Massenbird retorted. "You go home today, Mary, and you, too, Betty Patterson, if my word has any weight with your father."

"Oh, please—please, Miss Massenbird—not today—!" The men gathered closer, disappointed at the thought of losing "Glorious Betsy" so soon. La Vert, only, stood apart from the others, watching silently the by-play, that same faint smile on his lips, as though he kept some important secret.

"Ah, now, dear Aunt Ellen," Betsy pleaded "don't tell father. Please, don't. I'll be good right from now on. I won't do it again. Dear, handsome, Aunt Ellen, I'll try to be like you; I will now—"

"Not one word will I hear in defense of—of that!" Miss Massenbird pointed a scornful finger toward Betsy's bare feet that peeped out from beneath her skirt. "You're an outrageous girl, and your father shall know it." With a swish and a flourish Miss Massenbird turned and scurried into the hotel.

The three men watched the departing figure with a great show of relief. Indeed, Clay took a deep breath and sent up a prayer of thanks that the gentle lady had mentioned nothing further concerning his age. Sir Harry whistled softly, and Henry Blake, who had been digging his toe into the ground, looked up and smiled. La Vert remained leaning quietly against the pillar, looking on as though he were the veriest outsider. Betsy considered the group for a few minutes, her head cocked perkily on one side, and then she laughed.

"Well, say something," she challenged, running her eyes over the group. "You do look a pretty picture," she giggled. "Really, dreadfully—dreadfully foolish, all of you."

"I didn't break the storm-much by running ahead, did I, Betty?" Mary turned soberly to her cousin, shaking her head.

"Storm, dear? Why, that wasn't a storm," Betsy sighed. "That was only a gentle breeze before the tornado. Wait until you hear papa—"

"O, why there's Mr. Preston," Betsy turned as that gentleman emerged from the hotel. "Mary, did you know Mr. Preston had come back to the Springs?"

Mary blushed slightly as George Preston bent low over her hand. "Why, when did you arrive?" she questioned.

"I came late last night," the gentleman of the card game nodded and saluted the remaining guests. La Vert only he passed over with a slight bow, but the tutor merely lowered his head in return.

"But then, I know you'd return—so I'm not surprised," Betsy turned to Preston.

"You knew I'd return?" Preston bowed. "How?"

"Why, isn't Mary here?"

"Oh! Oh! Betty!" Mary stamped her foot and turned a vivid scarlet. "I—I really think I'd better go and do up my hair." She escaped into the comforting solitude of the hotel.

Betsy laughed. "I think you'd all better go now." Betsy turned to the men again. "But don't run off with my articles." She retrieved her belongings and waved her followers away.

CHAPTER IV

Betsy, watching the retreat of the three cavaliers, laughed softly to herself, and looked about as though expecting to see some one. But La Vert, as the others left, had stepped over the low casement of the hotel window, leading into the parlor. So she picked up her various belongings and padded her hair into place and sighed. If Aunt Ellen told her father of this escapade—and Aunt Ellen was certain to do that very thing—there'd be another storm. But, after all, she reflected, shrugging her shoulders, her father was much easier to handle than Aunt Ellen. She always succeeded in getting round him with her blandishments. She turned towards the doorway, but as she turned she heard voices.

ELECTION OF HOOVER MEANS REORGANIZATION

Will Without Doubt Be Along

WASHINGTON, Aug. 24—Herbert Hoover's election as president of the United States will result in a determined effort to carry out a governmental reorganization program along the lines of the plan that has proved effective in the commerce and interior departments.

This was indicated not only in Mr. Hoover's acceptance speech, but in an official pamphlet of the Republican National Committee made public today. It is entitled "Hoover's plan for Governmental Reorganization."

The introduction to the pamphlet states that one of the most fundamental and far-reaching speeches delivered by Mr. Hoover as secretary of commerce dealt with the reduction of waste in government by reorganization of executive departments, his views being made known before the annual meeting of the United States Chamber of Commerce in May, 1925.

"The Republican candidate for president has been a student of this vast problem and a consistent advocate of intelligent reorganization for a long time," the booklet declares. "His views are the more significant at the moment because the Democratic candidate has announced that he will bring forward a plan for the 'complete over-hauling' of the federal government."

"The fact is that all the federal reorganization which has been accomplished in recent years has been along lines developed by Mr. Hoover. In addition, he has a well-matured plan, the benefits of which he believes will be incalculable, both in direct savings to the taxpayers as well as in better service."

"Briefly, it provides for centering semi-judicial or semi-legislative functions in boards or commissions; and placing administrative duties in the hands of individuals."

"To give the chief executive full supervision at all times, Mr. Hoover would transfer all of the independent agencies of the government to the appropriate department."

Giving further point to that program, his work in reorganizing the commerce department so that it could carry on the great load it has handled in the past eight years and his consolidation of bureaus in the commerce and interior departments through the co-operation of Secretary Work and with the approval of President Coolidge, Mr. Hoover in his acceptance speech stated:

"Our Republican presidents have repeatedly recommended to congress that it would not only greatly reduce expenses of business in their contacts with government but that a great reduction could be made in governmental expenditure and more consistent and continued national policies could be developed if we could secure the grouping of these agencies devoted to the one major purpose under single responsibility and authority."

"I have had the good fortune to be able to carry out such reorganization in respect to the Department of Commerce. The results have amply justified its expansion to other departments and I should consider it an obligation to enlist the support of congress to effect it."

"The first public expression by Mr. Hoover on the need for reorganization of government departments, according to Washington records, was the example of the bears, which he cited in a speech at the National Press Club shortly after he became Secretary of Commerce."

"I have found that the brown bears are under the jurisdiction of the secretary of agriculture, the grizzly bears under the care of the secretary of interior, and the polar bears under my protection as Secretary of Commerce," he told the club.

That illustration, displaying the Hoover faculty for directing interest to a problem by mentioning some unique and humorous phase of it, has

Mr. Hoover has found hundreds of instances of overlapping of scattered functions, of "floating islands in the dismal swamp of bad organization," as he neatly expresses it. Divided responsibility with absence of central authority costs the taxpayers of the United States hundreds of thousands of dollars every year, his study has disclosed.

Examining the dispersion of government functions at present, Mr. Hoover has learned that there are 14 bureaus in nine government departments or independent agencies supervising construction of public works; 141 such bureaus in five departments directing conservation of national resources; fourteen in six departments handling direct aids to merchant marine and five in two departments looking after direct aids to industry; six in three departments concerned with direct aids to education, and thus through the whole list. The purchase of $250,000,000 worth of supplies annually is scattered through every branch of the government.

Large independent establishments like the Veterans' Bureau and the Shipping board as well as those of lesser size, should be directly responsible to a cabinet officer, in the opinion of the Republican candidate for president. They are now supposed to be under the direct supervision of the White House, although the maze of duties which the president must discharge prevents them from receiving adequate supervision and these responsibilities add to the unnecessary burdens of the president.

In his own department of commerce Mr. Hoover tried out his ideas with conspicuous success. After he assumed the office, representatives of commerce and industry were brought into conference to advise how the department might be organized to give the greatest measure of public service. With approval of Congress, divisions were set up for important commodity lines covering more than a score of commercial and industrial activities.

The two outstanding instances of grouping government functions more appropriately were the transfers of the Patent Office and the Bureau of Mines to the Department of Commerce from the Interior Department in 1925. President Coolidge, after listening to Mr. Hoover's ideas, agreed with him that both these bureaus had closer relationship with industry and commerce than with national resources. The technical and scientific services of the commerce department have coordinated their work with that of the bureau of mines, greatly increasing the value of its efforts.

Mr. Hoover does not fail to consider the relationship of Congress to the problem. He would suggest that the legislative branch of the government, after years of dealing with reorganization programs, now delegate the authority to proceed with it to the president or a special board, or a committee of its own members. Every other effort has failed, but none of them has had such a definite objective, such efficiency of purpose nor such a well-grounded basic plan as that suggested by the secretary of commerce.

He proposes, first, to group agencies having the same predominant major purpose under the same administrative supervision; second, to separate the semi-judicial, semi-legislative and advisory functions from those of an administrative character, placing the former under joint senate and the latter, under single responsibility and third, to relieve the president of a vast amount of the direct administrative labor.

Having grouped the related agencies under the appropriate departments, Mr. Hoover would have special assistant secretaries put in charge of them, basing their selection on other than political grounds. Creation of new departments under attentional cabinet officers is entirely unnecessary to carry his plan into effect according to Mr. Hoover.

Reduction of waste in federal administration by reorganization is considered by Mr. Hoover to be the third and final necessary step in the betterment of national government. The first two steps, basing of government employment upon merit and establishment of adequate control of appropriations through the budget system, have already succeeded.

Copyright 1928, Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc.
"GLORIOUS BETSY," starring Dolores Costello, is a Warner Bros. picture adaptation of this novel. Based on the play by Rida Johnson Young.

SYNOPSIS
Sweet Springs Inn is the scene of an early morning duel over a miniature of Betsy Patterson. Her French tutor, La Vert, wins the duel and the miniature from Preston, who boasted that Betsy had given it to him. Strutting in the woods, La Vert meets Betsy, who has been wading in the stream on a dare. She chides him for his unmanliness and lack of ambition. He says nothing of the duel, but, in turn, mocks the worthlessness of her cavalier. When he returns to the Inn he is discharged by Betsy's father for insolence. At that moment Betsy returns barefoot from her arboreal adventure.

"Some man! Some man, Mademoiselle," Monsieur La Vert corrected petulantly. But he moved towards the front of the portico, his chin sunk on his stock; his right hand across his breast and half hidden within his vest.

"I said to the corner of Bachelor's Row," Betsy was laughing. "Not another step further! Oh! That's a rough bit! Sir Harry, give me my slippers." Betsy stretched out her hand to the black haired Irishman with the laughing blue eyes, who had been tenderly guarding her slippers and hose. She took the slippers and hastily thrust her feet into them, and then ran up to the porch and soundly

Clay. You'd better wrap yourself up in that shawl you have bundled under your arm," Miss Massenbird announced with some asperity. "At your age, the early morning dews are dangerous."

Clay, looking somewhat chagrined, attempted to hide the shawl, but succeeded only in entangling the fringe with the buttons on his coat, and tried to move from out of the way of his accuser's eagle eyes.

"Oh, don't scold Mr. Clay," Betsy took up the cause of her admirer. "He's been so good to me. Auntie. He added a pair of gold garter buckles to Sir Harry's stockings." Betsy ran on, not heeding Clay's attempts to forestall her story. "If I'd walk barefooted, didn't he, Mary?"

"Indeed he did, Auntie," Mary asserted vigorously, "and they all kept betting and agging her on." She took Betsy's hand and looked around at the men, disregarding their negative nothings that asked of her to say nothing more. "It's just as much their fault as Betsy's." "That does not matter," Miss Massenbird retorted. "You go home today, Mary, and you, too, Betty Patterson, if my word has any weight with your father."

"Oh, please—please, Miss Massenbird—not today!" The men gathered closer, disappointed at the thought of losing "Glorious Betsy" so soon. La Vert, only, stood apart from the others, watching silently the by-play, that same faint smile on his lips, as though he kept some important secret.

"Ah, now, dear Aunt Ellen," Betsy pleaded. "Don't tell father. Please, don't. I'll be good, right from now on. I won't do it again. Dear, handsome, Aunt Ellen, I'll try to be like you; I will now."

"Not one word will I hear in defense of—that!" Miss Massenbird pointed a scornful finger toward Betsy's bare feet that peeped out from beneath her skirt. You're an outrageous girl, and your father shall know it." With a swish and a flourish Miss Massenbird turned and scurried into the hotel.

The three men watched the departing figure with a great show of relief. Indeed, Clay took a deep breath and sent up a prayer of thanks that the genteel lady had mentioned nothing further concerning his age. Sir Harry whistled softly, and Henry Blake, who had been digging his toe into the ground, looked up and smiled. La Vert remained leaning quietly against the pillar, looking on as though he were the veriest outsider. Betsy considered the group for a few minutes, her head cocked perkily on one side, and then she laughed.

"Well, say something," she challenged, running her eyes over the group. "You do look a pretty picture," she giggled. "Really, dreadfully—dreadfully foolish, all of you." "I didn't break the storm-much by running ahead, did I, Betty," Mary turned soberly to her cousin, shaking her head.

"Storm, dear? Why, that wasn't a storm," Betsy sighed. "That was only a gentle breeze before the tornado. Wait until you hear papa's—O, why there's Mr. Preston!" Betsy turned as that gentleman emerged from the hotel. "Mary, did you know Mr. Preston had come back to the Springs?"

Mary blushed slightly as George Preston bent low over her hand. "Why, when did you arrive?" she questioned.

"I came late last night," the gentleman of the card game nodded and saluted the remaining guests. La Vert only he passed over with a slight bow, but the tutor merely lowered his head in return.

"But then, I knew you'd return—so I'm not surprised," Betsy turned to Preston.

"You knew I'd return!" Preston bowed. "How?"

"Why, isn't Mary here?" "Oh! Oh! Betty!" Mary stamped her foot and turned a vivid scarlet. "I—I really think I'd better go and do up my hair." She escaped into the comforting solitude of the hotel.

Betsy laughed. "I think you'd all better go now," Betsy turned to the men again. "But don't run off with my articles." She retrieved her belongings and waved her followers away.

CHAPTER IV
Betsy, watching the retreat of the three cavaliers, laughed softly to herself, and looked about as though expecting to see some one. But La Vert, as the others left, had stepped over the low casement of the hotel window, leading into the parlor. So she picked up her various belongings and patted her hair into place and sighed. If Aunt Ellen told her father of this escapade—and Aunt Ellen was certain to do that very thing—there'd be another storm. But, after all, she reflected, shrugging her shoulders, her father was much easier to handle than Aunt Ellen. She always succeeded in getting round him with her blandishments. She turned towards the doorway, but as she turned she heard voices.

What's New?

NEWS changes with each passing hour. All kinds of news — fascinating, strange, prophetic, real and unreal. It comes flashing on the pages of your paper from all parts of the world, and you want to know what's new.

Advertising is a form of news. It is governed by the same general principles and answers your every question as to "what's new!" You can depend upon advertising news. It is truthful. If you want something for the home, you will find it advertised. If a dress, a suit of clothes, a hat, a pair of shoes, a diamond ring, a bridge lamp, an electric refrigerator or a house and lot — you'll find it advertised.

Advertisements supply the surest means of knowing "what's new" in merchandise. Learn to read them—trust them—profit by them.

'Cause' of That Village Duel Is 'Off' Chivalry for Life

Cops So Unreasonable About "Private Fight," Says Petite Miss

By International Illustrated News
NEW YORK.—Dueling over a "lady faire" may have wowed 'em in the days of Richard Cœur de Lion, but—times have changed. The cops just won't be reasonable about it!

So says petite Billy Netcong, Greenwich Village beauty. She ought to know. It was because he cared for her in a big way that George D. Noeling Jr., of Washington, rich, handsome—and terribly romantic!—challenged a rival to cross blades with him on the deserted stage of a tiny, arty village theatre recently, and got a pink in the shoulder and a fortnight in the hospital for his pains.

His adversary got a railroad ticket for somewhere else.

Poor Billy was left to face a multitude of prying, nosy reporters and the irate maternal parent of her knight errant, neither ordeal being particularly pleasant. The delicious, shivery feeling that came over her as two stalwart youths lunged at one another with borrowed "property" rapier, faded into an intense boredom before the avalanche of questions of newspapermen and the gray-haired, aristocratic mother. Nor were the police more reasonable. They talked interminably, asked names, dates, places. Billy's head swam dizzily.

So you can't blame her for allowing that Chivalry doesn't belong to the present age. At least not the knightly "have at you, varlet!" sort of chivalry. The aftermath to an affair of honor is just too embarrassing.

The heroine of the Village's one and only real duel in years was reared from her third to her sixteenth year in the quietude of a New England convent. Then she obtained permission to remain in the world outside. When her family moved to Chicago she and a girl friend hitch-hiked their way to New York, where Billy naturally gravitated to the Village, and the gay and easy life it offered, becoming first a clerk in a small store and later a model. Her acquaintanceship with young Noeling began when he came to New York to find work as an actor, an ambition in which he was opposed by his wealthy mother. But though Billy visited Noeling daily during his stay in the hospital, she denied—emphatically—that she felt for him any emotion other than that of friendship. He's too romantic to make a good husband, she said.

the natural beauty spots in the northern section of the state.

From Ausable Chasm, the motorist must choose between travelling on to Montreal or wending his way back home. If homeward bound, drive south through Jay, Elizabethtown and Schroon Lake to Chesterstown, where the original route is met once more. If Canada bound, follow the trail north to Montreal.

From Chesterstown, use the same route for the return trip.

State News

LANCASTER, Pa., Aug. 24.—(INS)—Lancaster city and county will celebrate the bicentennial next May, according to tentative arrangements made by the county commissioners and city officials.

Shot Her Stepfather

Mary Mulasunas, fifteen, former Brooklyn high school girl, pumped five bullets into her stepfather, Joseph Mikushas, in the hallway of her home and then gave up to the police. Revenge for a betrayal five years ago was motive, she told officers. Stepfather is in critical condition in a hospital.

(International Newsreel)

By an act of the State Assembly on May 19, 1729, Lancaster County was made a unit separate from Chester County. Later the residents of this town adopted the name Lancaster at the suggestion of John Wright, a native of Lancaster, England.

WAYNESBORO, Pa., Aug. 24.—(INS)—The contract for the Waynesburg-Graysville highway from Graysville to the West Virginia state line will be let by the county commissioners on September 1. The road is an eight mile project and the last link in the hard surfaced highway between Wheeling and Uniontown.

PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 25.—(INS)—Football scrimmages with Georgetown will form a conspicuous part of the fall training of the Temple University team. Georgetown advices received here disclosed, according to Graduate Manager Earl R. Yeomans, of Temple.

Most of the scrimmages will be staged at the Airport Field at Atlantic City where the Owl squad will begin its two weeks of fall training on September 4. The Georgetown team leaves almost simultaneously for Wildwood, so that the training periods of both teams are practically the same.

—Hugh McGee, of Wood and Lafayette streets, and Joe Keating, of Langhorne, Pa., have returned after a few days' visit with their relatives, Mr. and Mrs. Dever, of Mauch Chunk, Pa. —William Wilson, of Methuen, Mass., is visiting his uncle and aunt, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Pearson, of Wood street.
